THE INDEPENDENCE DAY HORROR AT KILLSBURY. By Asenath Carver Coolidge. Watertown, N. Y.: Hunkerford-Holbrook Company. Cloth, 244 pages.

The Fourth of July, in all the cities of the nation, with its ripping fire-crackers, its ear-splitting cannon crackers, its execrable toy pistols, its furious dynamite hand-bombs, and what-not, has come to be a terror to all sensible people. Independence has descended about as low as it possibly could, to express itself in the frightful ways by which we are all tormented every Fourth of July. There is a growing detestation of the thing, but as yet nothing has been accomplished towards putting an end to it except in a few places. In fact, it grows more each year, with the invention of new explosives, and its list of dead and maimed annually increases. Miss Coolidge has attempted in this story to contribute her share of influence towards a reformed Fourth. She has filled her book with intense feeling on the subject, and makes her brave heroine refuse in the end to marry a man who cultivates pyrotechnics and helps thus to kill and cripple people on Independence Day. The story, though in Miss Coolidge's usual vein, is, we think, a decided improvement over her former productions.

It is a novel with a purpose, and the reader will not have finished many pages before finding out what the purpose is, and then he will go on as fast as his eyes will carry him to the end of the book.
